Grosh Carriage Works

Charlene Van Brookhoven

The Moravian community of Lititz was a self-sustaining town until 1855 when the Moravian Church allowed non-Moravians to live and work within the church square. Every member of the community had a trade or skill which was shared with the townspeople. Charles Augustus Grosh was no exception.

In 1822 at the age of twenty, Charles A. Grosh took over the blacksmith shop at 300 East Main Street from Mr. Weinland. Grosh learned his trade from a gentleman in the Kissel Hill area when he was a young boy.

A few years later, Charles decided to turn the blacksmith shop into a home in preparation of taking a wife and raising a family. In 1826 he decided to ask the Moravian Church for a bride. This would have been accomplished through casting Lots, an early Moravian tradition leaving the decision of marriage up to God. His new wife, Susanna Shober, turned out to be an excellent choice as they celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary and raised fourteen children.

Mr. Grosh found it necessary to find a new location for his carriage shop at the corner of West Center Street and Pine Alley in Lititz. In 1857, two of his sons became partners and gave the name Grosh Carriage Works to the growing business. In this year, the partners found it necessary to build a larger shop which included several showrooms to display their carriages. This new building was at the corner of South Broad and West Orange Streets.

Grosh Carriage Works Con't:

One son, Samuel E., was a student at The John Beck Academy in Lititz and learned blacksmithing from his father during school breaks. He moved to Allentown for two years and learned the skills of coach making before moving back to Lititz. Another son, Henry Harrison Grosh, joined his brother as a partner to help alleviate their aging father Charles. At the death of Henry in 1892, Samuel conducted the business as S. E. Grosh & Co.

Charles William Grosh, son of Samuel E., was born in 1860 and became the third generation of The Grosh Carriage Works family. C. William joined the firm in 1899 and became an excellent carriage body maker as well as a painter and finisher. The Grosh Carriage Works was included in the Lititz directory in the years 1916-17 but under the name C.W. Grosh Carriage Works.

C. William was the last of the original owners as Samuel passed away in 1902. "Work built to order and fully guaranteed" was his advertising slogan.

Meanwhile, John F. Longenecker, another local wagon maker, saw the future in automobiles and opened the first auto dealership in Lititz at 64 North Broad Street in 1912. He sold Oldsmobiles and Chevrolets and also serviced and repaired the new "horseless carriages."

The automobile quickly took over the need for production of carriage makers and C. William Grosh found a new trade as a furniture maker. He opened a furniture business in the rear of 137 South Spruce Street and used his superior skills he learned in the production of carriages and coaches in Lititz.

The Grosh Carriage Works, at the corner of Broad and Orange Streets, was demolished to erect a new St. Paul Lutheran Church in 1911.
